Perhaps travel cannot prevent bigotry, but by demonstrating that all peoples cry, laugh, eat, worry, and die, it can introduce the idea that if we try and understand each other, we may even become friends.

Letter from the Director of Study Abroad Programs

Greetings to all Study Abroad Alumni, Friends and Supporters!

We're happy to bring you this Spring 2010 edition of The Peregrine. Study Abroad Programs at CU-Boulder has just completed a successful year and will be sending a record 339 students abroad this summer. Despite the challenging economy, our overall numbers are up over 10% for the coming year. Clearly students and their families continue to place a priority on study abroad, understanding how much an international experience abroad enhances the student college experience.

In this Peregrine, we continue our feature on awardees of the Study Abroad Programs scholarship. Tyffanie Ammeter's scholarship helped her in her dream of ultimately moving to Chile. New to this issue is an online quiz about food from around the world. See if you know the answers to all seven questions!

We also bring you a second article on short-term programs led by faculty at CU-Boulder, called Faculty-led Global Seminars. In this edition, read about South Africa from the point of view of the faculty director, Alphonse Keasley, as well as Matthew McAllister, one of the students on the program.

As it has been for a number of years, Spain is our top study abroad destination. This edition contains two stories from students who studied in Seville—23 years apart! Beebe Bahrami writes about how her study abroad trip led her to a professional writing career about the spiritual places of Spain, while Alyssa discusses the lessons learned about family while on study abroad.

Rounding out our tour of continents is an article by Erika Usui about Turkey—the dancing and traditions that she looks back on today.

I hope that you enjoy this issue of the newsletter of alumni of CU-Boulder study abroad programs - and that we will publish one of your stories in the near future.

Enjoy this edition of The Peregrine.

Mary Dando
Director, Study Abroad Programs

Do you have a story you want to share in The Peregrine?

The Peregrine is always looking for submissions. We love to receive articles from alumni about what their study abroad experience meant to them. We welcome articles (400 words or less is a good size) and 4-5 photos are greatly appreciated.

Suggestions for articles:

- 1) How has your study abroad country changed over the years since you were a student there?
- 2) How did you fund your study abroad experience? Did you receive a scholarship? How do you recommend that today's students seek funds?

Please send questions or submissions to The Peregrine at: AlumniSA@colorado.edu

20,000 Students, 20,000 Stories

Congratulations! You are one of more than 20,000 students that have studied abroad with CU-Boulder since we started sending students overseas in 1963.

This milestone has taken us 47 years to achieve. With over 20,000 study abroad alums, CU-Boulder can claim that one-tenth of the total alumni population of the university has studied overseas.

The Office of International Education at CU-Boulder formally created the Study Abroad Programs office in 1963. That year, there were 23 students going on 1 program—to Bordeaux, France. There was one staff member with part-time study abroad responsibilities. In 1966, three years after that first study abroad program, the 5 most popular destinations (out of a total of 6!) were France, Germany, Italy, Costa Rica and England (in that order.)

As of spring 2010, 20,195 students have studied abroad in 80 countries. In 2009-2010 alone, CU-Boulder sent 1,024 students overseas. We now have 13 staff that advise on and support programs around the world. Where do students go now? The top 5 destinations today are Spain, Italy, Semester at Sea, Australia and England (in that order.)

We can all speak to the benefits of study abroad. Each of us has witnessed changes due to the location, language, and academic climate of a different system. As we look forward to sending ever increasing numbers of students, the question arises, “If study abroad is so formative, what keeps students away?”

The 6 “Fs” of perceived student barriers to study abroad are: Finances, Familiarity, Fear, Friends, Family and Faculty (academics). Through consistent (and persistent!) outreach across the campus to students, families and friends, faculty, staff, and administrators, we are making the idea of study abroad more familiar, helping to disperse and demystify fears, reaching out to family and friends with publications and web pages devoted to their needs, and fostering relationships with faculty, staff and university administrators.

How can you help? Finances are key. Every dollar counts—and you can help with a donation on page 4.

Quiz: Name that Food . . .

All of us who have studied abroad understand that experiencing the food and food culture of another country is an integral part of the study abroad experience.

We have compiled a brief 7-question quiz for our alums on food and food culture from around the world. Click here and test your knowledge.

Is your country represented in the quiz? Send us a question for the next edition of The Peregrine.

Are you in contact with an alum of your study abroad program?

Is that alum in contact with Study Abroad Programs at CU-Boulder?

If your fellow study abroad alum hasn't sent us information on address or email changes recently, we would love it if you could pass along our greetings and interest in hearing about what is happening in the lives of our former students. Since we're no longer sending The Peregrine via postal mail, we hope to collect as many email addresses as possible in order to better reach our alums. With editions of The Peregrine, we will continue our outreach efforts in order to contact more and more alumni whose lives have been changed by the experience of living in another culture, speaking a foreign language, or spending a semester concentrating on global studies.

Alumni updates and correspondence can be sent to us at AlumniSA@colorado.edu. We are always happy to get article submissions for The Peregrine, email address updates from alums, and just plain letters about what you're up to. Thanks for passing the word along!

Scholars on Scholarships

Tyffanie Ammeter spent the Academic Year 2006 in Valparaíso, Chile on the CIEE Liberal Arts program. Tyffanie applied for and was awarded a scholarship from Study Abroad Programs at CU-Boulder. She also received an NSEP/Boren award. Below, she writes about how her scholarship from CU-Boulder Study Abroad Programs influenced her study abroad opportunity.

"As anyone who has studied abroad knows, one's perspective on life changes quite a bit through each experience abroad. Sometimes our lives change in ways we could never have imagined and that is exactly what happened to me. I spent the 2006-2007 academic year studying in Valparaíso, Chile with the goal of becoming fluent after seven years of studying Spanish. Not only was I able to accomplish that dream, but I also ended up marrying a Chilean and moving back to Chile in 2008 after graduating. Now I am working for a multinational company, using my English, Spanish and accounting skills!

The biggest challenge I faced in making that dream come true was not getting accepted into the program or travelling abroad for the first time in my life, it was the financial aspect of it all. Thanks to the SAP scholarship, among others, the daunting task of paying for my program was reduced greatly. Not only was the scholarship helpful in making my time abroad free of financial worries, but the study abroad office was only an e-mail away. Anytime I had a question or needed something from CU, the SA staff was more than willing to help out in any way they could. To this day I keep in touch and make sure they know that I can be used as a resource to anyone who has questions about Chile."

Students on the Faculty-led
Global Seminar to South Africa

The faculty-led Global Seminar, “Diversity and Reconciliation: the South African Model” is designed to introduce students to the concept of reconciliation and its application. The course addresses an oftentimes overlooked aspect that is essential for long-term peace to be achieved between conflict and peace--reconciliation. Because South Africa is a new republic whose future is highly dependent on a sustained peace for all South Africans, it has been chosen as an ideal site for studying a new democracy-in-the-making and the honesty needed for creating a society that can mature into a sustainable society of culturally different communities.

Students must return to the United States to apply their knowledge about reconciliation to diversity and inclusion matters in America. Students must analyze a current American context that would benefit from reconciliation processes and that would result in a sustained, peaceful situation on the university campus, the local Boulder community, the state of Colorado or nationally.

Made In South Africa: Visioning Reconciliation

Story and Photos by Alphonse Keasley

When I travel, I am curious and attentive to the ways people navigate everyday human experiences; in particular, how people in other lands celebrate happiness, and how they triumph over challenges. I pursue with tremendous delight understanding the cultural philosophies of the many different people who live on our planet.

In post-apartheid South Africa, my exploration of these forms of being human brought me in touch with the concept of ubuntu —“I Am Because We Are.” This approach to life in South Africa is one of the principles that allowed millions of Black Africans, who had been denied basic human dignity for centuries, to envision a reconciled South Africa. The first time I, an American, who was brought up in our law and justice society, encountered ubuntu, I presumed I understood and practiced this philosophy.

Atmosphere of Possibility

Story and Photos by Matthew McAllister

“South Africa is a third world country with first world influence.” This was one of the first things I heard after arriving in Cape Town last summer. It stayed with me throughout the trip and proved to be one of the most concise summaries of the country I heard during my three weeks there.

Cape Town

Matthew McAllister

Take Cape Town for instance. If you were to walk into the center of the city and look around you could convince yourself that you were in Denver. Limousines race down packed streets and tall skyscrapers tower above you. Sirens and honking horns are the background noise of the busy metropolitan center and everyone has somewhere to be.

Now let's jump to the Langa township, barely thirty minutes outside of Cape Town. There is a table on the side of the road with lambs'

Beebe Bahrami

Beebe Bahrami studied abroad in Seville, Spain with CIEE and after her return, worked in the Office of International Education at CU-Boulder. Below, we bring you tales and photos of her travels in Spain, plus an excerpt from her book, The Spiritual Traveler in Spain.

During my senior year at CU I finally realized that my longtime plan of going to medical school was the wrong direction for me. I scrambled to do what I really loved—languages and cultures—with my remaining time. Wanting to further my international education, I lucked out in being among the students from CU selected to go Seville, Spain, in the spring of 1986, on the CIEE Liberal Arts program.

My last-minute revelation was directly connected to the aftermath of the Iranian Revolution in 1979. My Iranian parents had made Boulder their home in the late 1950s and early 1960s and this was where I was born and raised. Up until 1979, I had spent a number of idyllic childhood summers in Iran. After 1979, that door closed and it took me another six years to realize that I was hardwired for cultural immersion in more than one culture.

Seville and southern Spain proved the perfect place for a person raised in progressive Boulder with Iranian roots. It was the perfect east-west blend. That I lived with a welcoming widow and her two teenage daughters in Triana and was immediately immersed into Andalusian life, sealed my fate: I had to find a way to go more deeply into that universe.

After I returned to Boulder, I took up two part-time student jobs—one from my past life, in a biochemistry lab, and another for my future life, in CU's Office of International Education. There I read and assessed surveys from students at all the Office's study abroad programs around the world toward discerning their successes and challenges. It was perfect work for a fledgling social scientist.

A year later, I commenced doctorate studies in anthropology at the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia. My CU semester in southern Spain had exposed me to the rich complexities of cultural mixing and coexistence; in graduate school I dedicated my research more deeply to that complex mix. For my thesis research, I lived in Morocco as a Fulbright scholar, made frequent trips to Spain, and gathered stories of remembering among the post-1492 exodus descendents of Iberian Muslims and Jews who now lived in Spain and Morocco, including a small group of Catholic Spaniards converting to Islam and claiming it was their ancestral faith.

I also found that the immense sacred sites of Spain, from the Paleolithic to the present, could only be understood by seeing the Iberian Peninsula as a great crossroads of people's over the millennia. In addition to Spanish, I also studied Portuguese, Arabic, and French in an effort to understand the complex whole of Iberia and the influence from her neighbors.

After a number of years, I also ventured into the north of Spain, intrigued by completely different regions that were rich with Celtic settlements, Visigothic and pre-Romanesque chapels, and a strong connection to the pilgrimage road to Santiago de Compostela, the Camino.

Both books, The Spiritual Traveler Spain—A Guide to Sacred Sites and Pilgrim Routes (HiddenSpring Books/ Paulist Press, 2009) and Historic Walking Guides—Madrid (DestinWorld Publishing, 2009) are available on Amazon or can be ordered through your favorite bookstore. More information, and articles on Spain, France, Portugal, and Morocco, can be found on Beebe's website, www.BeebesFeast.com.

Over the years I have become fascinated with the Camino. I have walked several routes along it, such as large stretches of the northern coastal road along the Atlantic, the French Road, and smaller portions of the Portuguese Road and the Silver Road.

Curiously, much of the Camino was actually built from gold tribute from medieval Muslim Spain to the northern Christian kingdoms, which was then funneled all the way to Cluny in France and invested into pilgrimage building campaigns in northern Spain under Cluny's direction. This colorful interweaving of north and south is everywhere, including in the far Atlantic north where contact with Muslims also existed, in spite of popular histories claiming they were separate.

My book, The Spiritual Traveler Spain—A Guide to Sacred Sites and Pilgrim Routes, is the result of these 24 years of exploring the nuances and details of Spanish culture all across the Iberian Peninsula. It is a nondenominational celebration of all of Spain's sacred traditions, reaching back 40,000 years right up to the present. It is filled with folkloric, anthropological, archaeological, and historic details.

Also recently released is my homage to Madrid, an historical walking guide to the city that I consider my home away from home. Historic Walking Guides—Madrid offers the reader a different Madrid, one that includes the famous sites but also walking routes in historic writers' and artists' footsteps, a route to historic wine taverns, and even an historical mysteries tour packed with unsolved occurrences, legends, and ghost stories.

My passion for Spain and my dedication to being a professional writer can be directly traced back to my chance to study in Seville while at CU. Ever since, I have told any student willing to listen that study abroad is perhaps the most important opportunity in college upon which to seize.

This excerpt from Beebe's book, The Spiritual Traveler Spain—A Guide to Sacred Sites and Pilgrim Routes can be found on page 3 (Chapter 1: The Prehistory and History of the Land):

"In Spain, layers of human presence from prehistory through to the present time exemplify many kinds of sacred sites and pilgrimages. From painted Paleolithic caves to the great Camino, the pilgrimage route across the north to Santiago de Compostela, to the smaller pilgrimages to a spring, a coast, a mountain, a chapel, a dolmen, or a vast plain, Spain is a rich mosaic of sacred sites. Spain is a land occupied by so many ancient peoples, and in ways more diverse than most of the rest of Europe, that it emits a feeling of many sacreds. Some sacreds are familiar, some are exotic, and together they infuse and flavor the whole like saffron in a pan of paella."

Alyssa Scharf

Mi Vida Española - Story and Photos by Alyssa Scharf

After months of preparation, I arrived in Sevilla, and 106 days later, I am getting ready to leave. How did this happen? I confess that I haven't thought much about the departure from Sevilla. In fact, a huge part of me ignored the truth that a semester of study abroad would eventually come to an end. What a completely life changing event this semester has been! I look back on all the weeks, all the Spanish, culture, my experiences, and I smile. I couldn't have wished for a better result. After all of this reminiscing, I realize there is one major provider of my extreme happiness: mi familia Española. Francisca Alba and Dioni Mula have truly shaped my life here in just three and a half months.

I knew I wanted to live with a host family before I chose the city for my semester abroad. I could have never imagined hosts like Francisca and Dioni. The day we met, January 22nd 2009, I was incredibly nervous. How was I going to introduce myself? What would they look like? Would they like me? When the moment came, the nerves flew away as Francisca introduced herself and her husband and told me that they would be mami and papi. We got in a taxi and upon arrival to the apartment; I realized this would be my home, my family, and my life for the next three months.

The language barrier was tricky at first, but Francisca and Dioni were very patient and I was comforted to know that I was not the first student they hosted. Our conversations were great from the start. Francisca was great at explaining things I didn't know and telling me about the rest of the family while Dioni was the one who could answer all my questions about Sevilla. One day, I asked him if he wanted to take a walk with me. For the next two hours, we roamed the center of Sevilla and in specific, Santa Cruz, the old Jewish quarters. This was meaningful to me as I am Jewish. Dioni was so knowledgeable and stopped to show me even the smallest details and photo opportunities. We finished our paseo [walk] in a small bar with some manchego [cheese] and a small glass of Mista [white wine]. I look back on that evening every week and I am reminded of how far I have come.

Alyssa Scharf with her Spanish host family

Francisca told me from the start that she was here to at least provide some cariño [affection]. She didn't understand how some señoras can be cold, and for example, make the food for the student and leave. More than give me cariño, she let me into her life. At the age of 15 she left school to pursue her talent: sewing. Her work is amazing; she even made her own wedding dress. She worked for herself, even after she married Dioni. Family is the number one thing she talks about. I'll never forget her conversations with her lonely neighbors. They tell her their whole story and she patiently listens and replies with "si...si...si...claro...si." I'll also never forget her food, as I am in the process of writing down all of her delicious recipes.

Saying goodbye really will be the hardest part because I've grown so close to these two people in such a short period of time. I'm going to remember them and everything they taught me for the rest of my life. However, with plans to return and all of these memories kept in a special place, maybe adios is actually hasta luego.

Turkish Charm Will Captivate your Soul

Story and Photos by Erika Usui

“Your soul will stay in Istanbul.”

That's what Nurdoğan Şengüler of Les Turcs Arts told me as we chatted in his third-floor office in Sultanahmet, Istanbul, over Turkish tea and dessert.

As I stared past him out the window to take in the beauty of the city, I had to agree. The sound of the afternoon call to prayer hummed gently from the world-famous Blue Mosque and the Hagia Sofia as they stood proudly over the beautiful seaside landscape shaped with historic stony hills.

The city vibrated with ambitious entrepreneurs who chatted with clients on their outside patios over hot apple tea. The aroma of luscious Mediterranean cuisine filled the air, while the taste of sweet baklava made the rosy city even rosier. I was just absolutely in love with the beauty that surrounded me.

You can't leave your heart here because your heart is a physical object that stays with you, Nurdoğan said to me. But your soul, your metaphysical, untouchable soul, can stay where it wants to.

Erika Usui

Les Turcs Arts, where I indulged myself during my five-day stay in Istanbul, is an arts academy that has been around for upwards of 12 years. The owner, Nurdoğan, speaks more than five languages and treats visitors from all over the world to his vast knowledge of Turkish film, literature, photography, calligraphy, dance, music and much more. And run-to guy Alp Akşahin, who does everything from managing websites to conducting tours, is the epitome of a Turkish gentleman with his wit and ever-so-charming lines – “in Istanbul, we say that the sun sets on the most beautiful girl. Right now, it's setting on you.”

The twosome led me to dance instructor Aytül, a veteran dancer who teaches Turkish gypsy-style belly dance. As the former Ottoman Empire, Turkey has an exotic history of harems in which some say that women dancers performed in closed quarters for the sultan to the nine-beat rhythm of Turkish gypsy music.

A number of other seasoned dancers run Aytül's studio as well, teaching a variety of dances from Brazilian Capoeira to Cağdas

Dans, or contemporary dance. Nurdoğan, a refined dancer himself, gives lessons amidst his busy day, twirling and swirling in his office the Karşılama, or the Turkish “meeting and greeting” folk dance.

Where the East meets West is where Turkey lays, where the Orient and the Occident is connected with a single bridge. It is where a rich cultural tradition has survived through changing times and where one of the most unique, layered history of religion thrives. It is where complete strangers will welcome you into their homes and offer you a cup of apple tea with however many cubes of sugar you wish, to embrace you with “Turkish hospitality,” as they call it.

As I promised Nurdoğan, I will return soon to Istanbul to revisit its charm, its magic.

To revisit my soul.

I have never forgotten those great people who participated and taught me that I could be a better man.

My life now is very different than it was then, but still very dramatic and experiential. I am a desert dweller, enjoying the views of the San Gorgonio and San Jacinto Mountains. During the week, I run to the coast of California to make money. There I live on my 32 foot sailboat. It's a heavenly life. Also, I have been in a five-year relationship with the love of my life and am very happy.

Soon, I am headed back to Florida, my home state, for a visit with family, hoping to not see too much oil wash ashore or pelicans and dolphins dead. My fundamental mission in life is to stay true to the environment both within and outdoors, thinking that we should all do what we can to save the planet. Good old Boulder has never left my blood. KURZ, Ann (Bordeaux. France AY 1966-67) Ann writes to us that, "It has been a little over 40 years since my Boulder Study Abroad experience, and now as I look toward retirement, I realize I was shaped by that year in myriad ways. It was the key to my global understanding, outreach, and perspective on this rich, varied, and perplexing world. Anyone who has studied abroad can verify that it doesn't begin to compare to just visiting as a "Tuesday-It-Must-Be-Belgium" tourist. One truly becomes immersed in that country's daily life and culture. I studied in the Bordeaux, France program, and am sad to know it no longer exists. For all its faults, it was a wonderful education.

Not only did my Junior Year Abroad experience in 1966-67 give me the necessary background, exposure, and expertise in French language and literature, but it also gave me the edge in landing my first teaching position after graduation in '68. Many years and locations later, I was once again able to compete with much younger teachers, as I sought to reenter the field after my children were older. I am proud to say that I taught French again in 2006, levels I through IV until I was RIF'd (reduction in force) at the end of that year. The following year, I taught French again, at the middle school level, in another school district, along with Spanish and Chinese (learned both while living in LA for 9 yrs.).

Now I am once again unemployed--my choice this time--and a first-time grandmother! Lacey Ann was born April 2, 2008, and I have not looked back since. I take care of her while my daughter works and goes to school, and yes, I am teaching her French, Spanish, and some Chinese! Some relatives have told me I'll mess up my granddaughter as she learns English; I say, no, it will help her to learn it even better. Her ear is amazing, and she can reproduce sounds beautifully at 14 mos."

Ann would enjoy hearing from other alumni from the Bordeaux program, regardless of year they participated. She ended her update to us by saying "Go Buffs! Grosses bises, Annie de Far Quest (name some French people gave me)." Her mailing address is: Ann Enterline Kurz, 108 Hilltop Blvd, Canfield, OH 44406. E-mail: anitflash1964@yahoo.com

Daily, I work with a strong sense of community; I cultivate my sense of “we” through my leadership studies. However, it was not until my Global Studies students struggled with witnessing and lamenting the structural inequality in South Africa townships did I come to recognize a critical Black South African cultural reality: ubuntu is second nature for many, if not most, black South Africans. Secular forgiveness, rather than retributive justice and revenge, naturally follows ubuntu. It was this experience with my students that allowed me to discover a perfect reason for American students to study abroad: to expand their critical insights and skills for becoming authentic citizens of the world.

Indeed, the University of Colorado at Boulder students who traveled to Johannesburg and Cape Town, South Africa as the trailblazers for a part of the Global Seminar Diversity and Reconciliation: The South African Model grappled with their well developed sense of law and (social) justice and the African principle of ubuntu. As their blogs reflected, the generosity of time opened up many of them to ubuntu thinking. As is the purpose of the course, many of the students also recognized the need for ubuntu and reconciliation for American situations in the United States.

Diversity and Reconciliation: The South African Model is a powerful three-week experience that continues even after students return to the United States. For example, Matthew McAllister has produced a powerful video final project reflecting the impact of his South African experience and his desire to pursue Martin Luther King, Jr.’s vision of “The Beloved Community.” Matthew’s video is available for viewing at www.vimeo.com/5848432.

heads sitting on it, being consumed by flies. We hear that the nose and tongue are the best parts after they’re cooked. Across the street is a small shack where several women are brewing beer. It has taken them three days to make it and costs less than a dollar to purchase the entire vat. Life moves a lot slower here. What especially struck me was how stereotypical the experience was for me as a white westerner. Barefooted children came running on broken glass to us, using our arms as jungle gyms. It was the cookie cutter scene of a white person in a poor African neighborhood being surrounded by children and it was very surreal. The village had an unemployment rate of roughly 70% and there was one source of water only every three miles.

I think people struggle with experiences like this because we’re not used to such expansive poverty. We want to take those children out of the situation they are in but we usually don’t think about why that situation exists in the first place.

The country is bounding forward in certain areas, building dozens of soccer stadiums in preparation for hosting a major international sporting event; but at the same time it is struggling to fulfill its promise of providing homes for the millions who lack basic shelter. This polarizing situation and the stark contrast in wellbeing across the society makes it one of the most unequal parts of the world.

There is a distinctive atmosphere all over South Africa, in both Cape Town and Langa, an atmosphere of possibility. South Africa has been born again and these next few years may be the years that define the country for decades to come.
